BMA Foundation for Medical Research

"Charities play a particularly important role. Funding is needed to run all research and our primary goal, as with the charities, is just to do the best research for the patients."

Mr David Eldred-Evans, winner of the 2018 TP Gunton and Helen H Lawson Grants

About us...

The Foundation has been awarding research grants since 1839. It was one of the first professional organisations to award scholarships and prizes to encourage and further medical research.

Today the grants help fund innovative medical research in a variety of areas, from neurological disorders to cancer and from asthma to heart disease, as well as many others. The grants are awarded to medical doctors and research scientists. For many the grants are key to supporting their career development and contributing to advances in medical research.

"The project funded by Margaret Temple represented one of the most important milestones in my career so far. It allowed me to train alongside distinguished world-class clinical academics in an extremely stimulating, motivating scientific environment."

Dr M Rizig, previous winner of the Margaret Temple grant.

Why support the BMA Foundation for Medical Research?

As a charity, our Foundation is fully reliant upon the generosity of individuals. Without the money received from donations, the Foundation would not be able to fund medical research and continually strive to make progress for future generations.

With research funding budgets constrained across biomedical research and the medical profession, we will endeavour to increase levels of funding in this difficult time, and to continue supporting the highest quality projects.

You can choose to donate to an area of research that is important to you. If you would like to specify an area of medical research please speak to a member of the Foundation staff team. We will add your award to the next round of grant applications. Applications open 1 January but we begin advertising the grants earlier in the previous year.

How to give a gift

Giving a gift to the BMA Foundation for Medical Research is easy. Gifts can either be given for 'the purpose of general medical research', or there is the option to specify an area of medical research that you would like your gift to support.
